VOL.03

Our animal friends were busily cleaning up after lunch.

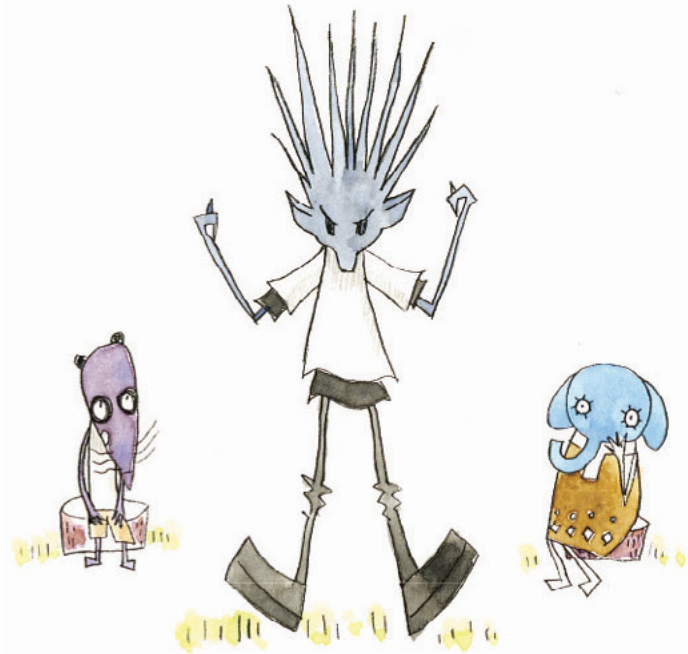

"All right then, everybody. The venue is ready. We can now begin our conference," Harri's voice rang through the forest. The animals proceeded to seat themselves.

...well, all but one. It seems we are missing one of our participants.

"I don't see Max here. He hasn't returned from going to buy his canned drink somewhere," remarked Bodhi.

Everyone sat there looking at each other, wondering what to do.

"What is going on here? He should have more respect for such an important meeting!" Harri completely lost his patience. The others were beginning to fuss as well, ...when Max finally appeared, riding in a shiny red convertible. Holding a can of Coke in one hand, he sat there, leaning back in his flashy car. While all the animals looked in surprise, Max slowly stepped out.

"Hey, thanks for waiting. You wouldn't believe the trouble I had to go through to find a vending machine! I finally found some Coke in a supermarket. Didn't want to be late for the conference, so I rented this car and zoomed back!" Max proceeded to gulp down his can of Coke.

Seeing Max's behavior, the usually patient Bodhi blew up in anger.

"What were you thinking of, Max! Renting a car for a single can of Coke? And, look at the size of this car!"

Harri's pointy fur stood on its end as he scolded Max.

"Bodhi is right. Don't you start polluting this beautiful forest with your dirty exhaust! Why don't you just walk!"

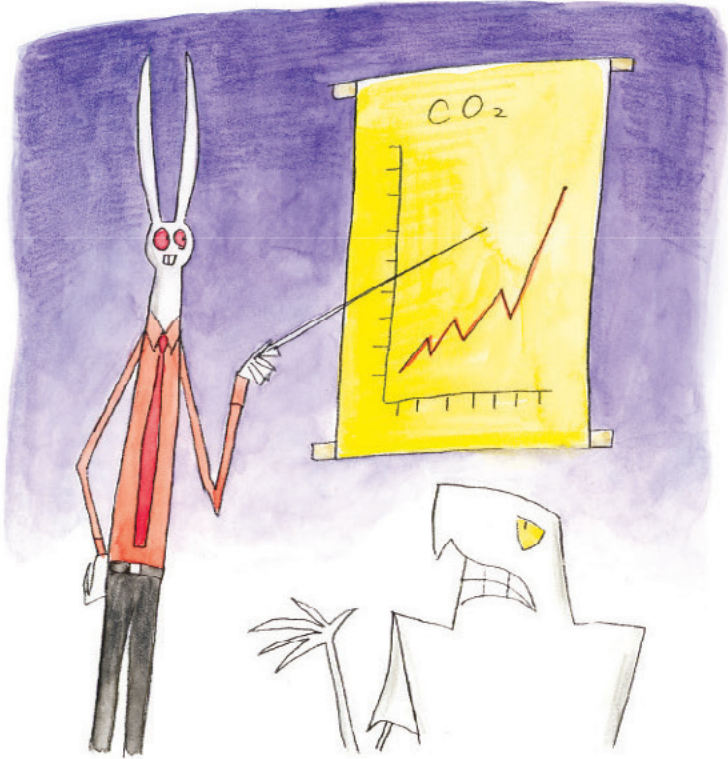

Max, however, seemed completely unfazed by such criticism. Gently stroking the hood of his shiny car, he said to himself, "all this backward thinking. What a bore! What's wrong with riding in cars? Look at this powerful baby. It's so cool."

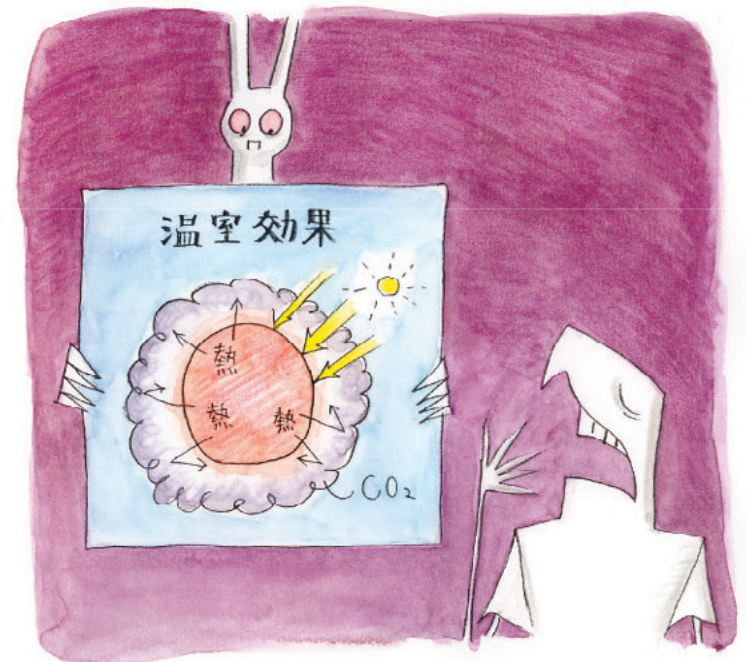

Bodhi began preaching to Max in a loud voice, "You are the one who is backwards, Max. The pollution of our planet's air by auto emissions is one of the biggest problems of our times. Don't you know this?"

Dr. Rabbit quickly pulled out a sheet and started to explain, "Ahem. I would like everybody to look at this graph. It shows the devastating increase of carbon dioxide in the earth's atmosphere."

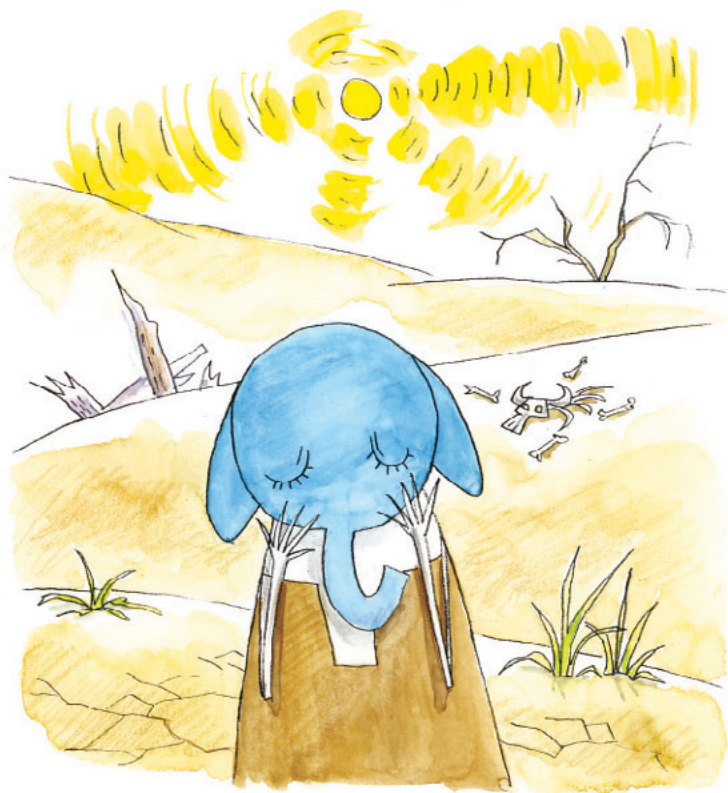

"Well, what about it?" Max asked, displaying little interest.

Dr. Rabbit held out another board. This one was titled, "The Greenhouse Effect". "Ahem. Presently, due to such continual increases of carbon dioxide caused by gas emissions, our planet's temperature is actually increasing as we speak."

"Yeah? So what?" yawned Max.

"Don't you know, Mr. Max? If the earth's temperature continues to increase at such rates, the deserts will expand, plants will wither, and all the earth's animals will die from hunger and thirst!" Mama Elle spoke in a trembling voice, her trunk quivering.

"Correct. Not only will we have more deserts, the ice in Antarctica and the North Pole will also melt, causing sea levels to rise as well. More than a few of our countries will actually disappear under water." Dr. Rabbit painted a dim view of the planet's future.

All the animals gasped in fear. Max was now finally beginning to understand the reason why driving cars may not be the greatest thing for the earth's environment. He twirled his car key uncomfortably and dropped his head.
